Critical thinkers within the international occupational therapy profession are challenging the culturally-specific and value-laden assumptions that underpin dominant models of occupation and modes of practice, and are advocating the adoption of critical perspectives. This book addresses these concerns, employing an evidence-informed approach that helps readers recognize specific social structures and ideological assumptions that inform occupational therapy's research, theories and practices, and how these same factors create and reinforce conditions that impact people's abilities to participate in occupations. Drawing from a wealth of cross-cultural research evidence the author demonstrates, unequivocally, that occupation is a determinant of human health and wellbeing, and provides a new conceptual framework for occupational therapy. Engagement in living: Critical perspectives on occupation, rights, and wellbeing is a timely and valuable resource for all occupational scientists and occupational therapists – students, practitioners, educators, researchers and theorists – for policy makers, and for anyone interested in the relationship of occupational engagement to human wellbeing and human rights.
